Are Single-Specialty CINs as Valuable as Multispecialty CINs?

By Aimee Greeter, MPH, FACHE, Senior Vice President | Coker Group

As the healthcare industry shifts toward narrow networks, closer alignment, and tighter integration, current trends indicate the advent of more single-specialty-only clinically integrated networks (CINs). However, can a single-specialty network achieve as much value as a CIN that is more encompassing?

To answer that question, let's set the record straight that while single-specialty CINs are inherently more limited, they are not entirely exclusive.

Mitigating Risk when Migrating from one EMR to Another

By Gabriel Harry, Senior Manager | Coker Group

Healthcare organization's digital footprints are becoming more integrated, which is leading them away from legacy electronic medical records (EMRs) to more integrated EMRs. While industry regulations and reporting requirements drive these initiatives, it does leave physicians and providers wondering, "How will I be able to access my patients' historical clinical documentation?" Also, other operational leadership wonders, "How will our organization manage our A/R moving forward?" For a successful EMR-to-EMR conversion, it is imperative to vet these questions in the process of advancing a data conversion strategy.
